Introduction

For a long time academics and practitioners took interest in Knowledge Management ideas and theories especially within context of organizational performance improvement. With knowledge taking on a key strategic role, many organizations have embarked on enterprise-wide knowledge management initiatives with the aim of leveraging as well as transforming organizational knowledge assets into core competencies to obtain competitive advantage. In general, effective Knowledge Management ensures that business-critical knowledge becomes more visible and more appropriately available for better decision making. Companies with superior knowledge Management resources are more competitive.

On the other hand Leadership plays a major role in determining the success or failure of an organization and the certainty that Leadership skills can be developed. We all possess the capacity for Leadership, but only those who cultivate it will ever become truly effective leaders. It is firmly believed that Leadership is the most important resource an organization can possess.
